Last year, the former Pink Floyd bassist and chief songwriter sat for an interview about the making of The Wall, the group's 1979 epic about isolation, disillusionment, conformism and fascism. Asked if he'd ever do the album in its entirety again, Waters said he doubted it. Then he paused.

"I said I might do it outdoors in Germany if they ever took the Berlin Wall down," he recalled recently.

They did, and he will. Tomorrow at Berlin's Potsdamer Platz, near the Brandenburg Gate, Waters will stage a massive production of The Wall that involves more than 600 people, including musicians, workers from East and West Germany, a Soviet military marching band and a full East German symphony orchestra and choir. Workers are constructing a 600-foot-long and 60-foot-wide wall that will be symbolically destroyed during the finale.

Guest stars for the event include musicians Joni Mitchell, Sinead O'Connor, Van Morrison and James Galway, and actors such as Tim Curry, Albert Finney and Jerry Hall. More than 180,000 people are expected to see the show in Berlin, with another billion watching via television holdings around the world. PolyGram Records plans to release an album from it on Aug. 21.

from it on Aug. 21.

Waters' show will be a benefit for the organization that talked him into it: the Memorial Fund for Disaster Relief, an international charity founded by Leonard Charity for the same show that aims to raise $800 million (U.S.) during the next five years — $8 for every life lost in major wars during this century. Once the Berlin Wall opened, the National Fund spent five months negotiating with both gove ernments, as well as with military representatives of the United States, Britain, France and the Soviet Union. "It was an enormous coup by the people who did it," Waters said. "I make no
